Fri, 06 Jul 2018 04:37:00 GMT - When a beach forms, waves and currents continuously hit the shoreline. This causes erosion of the land on the shore and causes loose sediment from the body of water to move onto the land. Over time, the erosion turns the land into small granules. The granules mix together and form sand. The composition of the sand is dependent on where the beach is located and what type of organic matter and land forms are found in the area.

- Beach front flora plays a major role in stabilizing the foredunes and preventing beach head erosion and inland movement of dunes. If flora with network root systems (creepers, grasses and palms) are able to become established, they provide an effective coastal defense as they trap sand particles and rainwater and enrich the surface layer of the dunes, allowing other plant species to become established. They also protect the berm from erosion by high winds, freak waves and subsiding flood waters.
